Talking About Cancer Is Not One Size Fits All

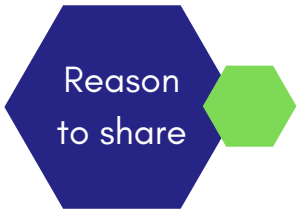

Most parents struggle with decisions to share or withhold information about cancer when talking to children. Naming the dilemma can help make it a little easier to navigate. These are just a few examples of the different directions that parents are pulled in when trying to choose what's best for each moment and child.

Worrying together is easier than worrying alone.

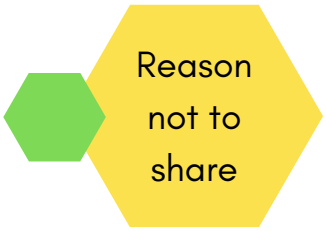

The less children know, the less they have to worry about.

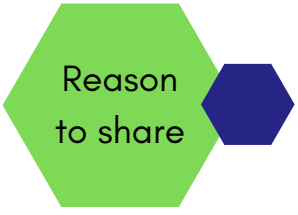

Giving information builds trust that you'll tell the truth.

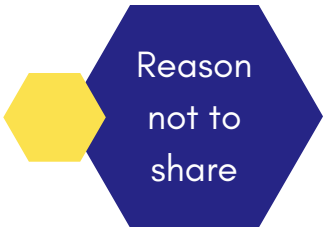

Shielding information builds trust that you'll carry the biggest burdens.

Sharing empowers kids to make informed choices about their time and their bodies.

Holding back harsh realities protects kids from feeling despair.
